

As children become adults, their social behavior changes in some ways. What are the main differences between young children's social behavior and that of adults? To what extent are the changes that take place good?

The fact of individuals' manners and characters is rooted in their family and after that their society which they have belonged to. It is undeniable that everyone has their model of a behavior due to the different reasons such as diversities of individuals' genes, different parents and also difference of the level of family culture and economy. Every offspring grows up in diverse conditions and becomes a special adults. The differences in children's behavior till their adulthood refer to their personality and their exterior environment.

The first role model for offspring in the family and society is parents. They act as their parents do and continue this behavior in school. Although children promote their family etiquettes in their school, they can imitate their peers' behavior too. This situation almost happens in primary school and as they become older to reach teenage ages, they prefer to show themselves fashion-conscious and up-to-dated more than their counterparts. At the young ages children obey their parents' commands more than young adults at teenage ages who show a lot counter-social manners which is pointed out as a transition period in youth. Teenagers always try to show off and fearlessly break the law in a community. The main reason for this behavior is that to find a place in society and also introduce them to it. W, while adults have their own place in society and know the presence of rules and regulations are useful and vital for every social structure, so they will obey rules. Not only do adults comply with all of regulations, but also they always try to solve the problems which citizens face and guide teenagers to respect the laws.

There is no doubt that becoming older is a disputable fact which we have to follow the trend. Clearly, adolescent-adolescence period is the most appreciated d level which leads to results s from mental and emotional progress. Adults behave properly and logically compared to teenagers. This level of community has the benefit for society as they will take the role of parents and a decent position in market labor. The Youth burden a large amount of money on governments to learn basic sciences and skills too and also spend more time to become becoming useful for their country, unlike mature ones who can afford their needs and have benefits for their city.

In conclusion, it is crystal clear that the benefits-presence of adults are-is more suitable-beneficial than young children's s for every community. Adult ages are the most prosperous, they have both benefit for youngsters and elders and the whole society as well. There is a viewpoint that says-maintains that for having a successful society, there-it is necessity-necessary to instruct the new generation from the beginning to have a prosperous victorious country.
