

One of the major problems that city dwellers are faced with could be named as housing shortage, which in turn leads to a handful of social problems. Governments, from my point of view, play a pivotal role in ~~as to how to ameliorate~~ ameliorating this dire state of affairs.

Obviously, thanks to lack of supply as well as the huge amount of demands, citizens' are more likely propelled toward slums which has brought many social difficulties in its wake. First of all, due to largely produced contaminants by those who are living in so-called areas, homeless people are far more susceptible to diseases. Besides, they are even more vulnerable to natural disasters such as snow or prolonged rainfall, more than others. Finally, it is common knowledge that the rate of crime ~~involves-correlates with~~ life satisfaction, so it could creep up while one's s' very fundamental requirements, need for shelter in particular, are not met.

Seeking out a solution, governments must take promising measures, otherwise, barely could we expect possible improvement. ~~House~~ Housing provision, for example, would be probably able to lessen the load as would upgrading slums to relatively equipped houses. Besides, converting abandoned areas for residential use is considered another option that is to resolve the problem, thereby saving a lot of our community members' lives-ultimately, changing society into a fairly desired one in terms of life-standards and security

Many a city dweller is in constant challenge with the lack of houses, thus finding his way into slums. This is not considered a condition that authorities turn a blind ~~eye~~ to. ~~Besides, they had better~~ broaden their vision in order to come up with a more effective solution.
