

Big salary is ~~much more~~ important than job satisfaction.
Do you agree or disagree?
Provide relevant examples if necessary.

These days many people believe that ~~the jobs has been~~ chosen with high wages ~~is-are~~ advantageous, despite ~~the fact that it they doesn't may not~~ appeal to you at all. I personally ~~intend-tend~~ to opine that workers' contentedness with their job is more significant than a big stipend.

First of all, ~~a~~ satisfying occupation keeps you stimulated; therefore, this leads to career progression and may have better job prospects. In other words, employers are motivating employees, since it will augment productivity. People ~~do-follow~~ their interest ~~and~~ become more professional in their pursuit than ~~those~~ who put wage ~~first in the first place~~. For instance, Vera Wang left her prior job (~~as a~~ journalist) in spite of the good wage and ventured to become a fashion designer. She tolerated fluctuation in her new career and became one of the most famous and well-paid designers in the last century. Thus, job satisfaction profits far outweigh the drawbacks of its low salary ~~in-from~~ a long-term perspective.

Secondly, if employees ~~are~~ content with their works, they would create a better working environment. Hence, members of an organization are enjoying a higher level of job satisfaction ~~and~~ tend to be more helpful and amicable to their colleagues at work, unlike ~~someone-a person who~~ is just earning a high salary, whereas ~~he~~ feels tensed and ~~has~~ conflicts with his conscience. To illustrate, Google is one of the most ~~important~~ firms ~~that-where~~ jobs satisfaction has higher priority than a big stipend, ~~it-which~~ leads to making a name for the company for its extraordinary working environment. That's why more important to establish a company that makes its employees happier than only ~~pay~~ high wages.

By way of conclusion, I once again restate my view that job satisfaction is more beneficial than a big salary because it makes people fruitful and stimulated.
