

Nowadays courses and general study online are getting very popular. However, some people still prefer attending classes in person. Discuss both views and give your own opinion.

Considering the statistics of online courses reveals that despite the disadvantages of such programs, an overwhelming majority of the populace tend to take part in virtual-classes rather than traditional ones. When it comes to this notion, I opine that in spite of the potential pitfalls the merits of this new approach of training far outweigh the demerits, hence the importance of this new approach of training.

We are living in a world where the glorious flag of learning and education is hoisted atop successful lands. Scarcely can a nation achieve the crests of success without an acceptable population of highly educated people. Spending too much time in the workplace, people living in large cities rarely can manage their time to attend a real class. Another interesting benefit of this method of education is the possibility of distance learning for almost everyone who solely accesses the Internet. People living in developing areas where more often than not they are not able to participate in high-standard traditional educational centers can benefit from online classes.

Having said that, perhaps the advocates of these programs cannot deny the fact that online education is not appropriate for practical majors such as sports, medicine, and fine arts. Distance learning of a swimming class, for example, can lead the learning session into a disaster for obvious reasons. Furthermore, technical problems are inherently part of online learnings which undoubtedly can have adverse impacts on online classes. We rarely have control over unexpected power cuts, malfunction of computers, or speed slowness of the Internet.

To cut a long story short, I wholeheartedly hold that not only are online courses beneficial to students who can hone their skills, but it also has myriads of positive points for society with more skillful workers. It is high time developed countries distributed their knowledge to underdeveloped or developing countries to take one of the primary steps to spread the message of peace and love across the world.
