

In many countries, the proportion of older people is steadily increasing. Some think this good, while others believe this a problem for a county. Discuss both views and give your own opinion.

Much has been discussed about the problems associated with an aging population, yet some might still harbor a positive thought towards this, whereas others would not find this trend healthy for society. I believe this transformation is challenging, and it might hinder the financial development of countries.

The younger generation can always learn from the experience of the elderly; this might be a sound argument for some to accept this change in the age demographic of a country. That is because over the course of time, older people have been collecting some invaluable experience in different aspects of life, which could be of use and passed down to the youth when needed. For instance, when a country is struggling with a national turmoil, the government could benefit from the senior members of society by consulting them to find solutions for the crisis. If countries do not have a considerable number of elderly people around, this option would not be on the table, leading to a possible nationwide issue.

Nonetheless, having an old population will definitely have its own serious predicaments along the way. A very evident one is having an ailing economy. That is to say, as citizens age, the percentage of the young workforce would decrease, resulting in a shortage of labor. Therefore, the country will most likely enter a period when despite having enough job vacancies, the majority of them will be left unfilled. As a result, the government will face severe financial problems. Some Scandinavian counties are actually suffering from this very issue discussed above. Desperate for a fresh workforce, many of such countries are now asking foreign professionals to come to the country to help grow the economy.

It might be safe to suggest that while having a society with the proportion of elderly people higher than their younger counterparts presents some merits, the gravity of the situation that it will carry is more concerning since it is related to the economy of a country, which is obviously ~~is~~-crucial.

Rising fitfully in the first few years, the sales are predicted to jump in two stages, reaching a high of 4000 $ in ... and 6500 $ in