Teachers should encourage their students to question everything. Agree or disagree?

Deciding whether inspiring students to question everything has a positive impact on them or not is considered a controversial debate. Some believe it is better for teachers to motivate students to ask questions as opposed to people who frown upon this idea. However, I am of the first idea and have three points in support of my viewpoint which I will mention in the following essay.

To begin with, most of the times encouraging students to question everything is a practical way to improve their self-esteem or self-confidence. Due to the fact that students learn how to ask teachers for solving their educational misunderstandings. Moreover, by make students feel free about asking questions in the class, we increase their speaking ability and confidence in front of their peers and even other people. When I was younger, I would have said that it would not help students by their lack of self-confidence but my university experiences have shown the exact opposite point. I mean asking question in the middle of classes has made me more confident.

Secondly, sometimes students do not gain the eminent point of a lesson and encouraging them to ask about their education issues is vital in order for them to understand the next lessons. Because lessons are sequent and connect to each other it is important for tutors to lead their students in questioning path. For instance, when I used to go to high school I struggled with a lesson of mathematics and by asking questions I learnt that part of lesson and prevent next misunderstandings because those lessons were connected to one another.

Last but not least, asking questions teaches students to not accept everything. In addition, sometimes asking a question is a good way to make aware teachers about their unconscious mistakes. For example, one of my university professors made mistakes automatically during his presentations and we tried to remind him of his mistakes by asking him relevant questions. Having said that, students should not be made to ask questions because it may give some of them anxiety.

To cut a long story short, the aforementioned points and examples have shown that encouraging students to question everything is not only a practical way to enhance their self-confidence, but also essential for learning related lessons. It also reduce teachers' mistakes during their presentations.
