

If people have the opportunity to get a secure job, they should take it right away rather than wait for a job that would be more satisfying. Agree or disagree?

In general, finding a career /job/work/occupation is both a tough and an important stage of every individual's life, but finding a suitable ~~occupation one~~ would be even more challenging. Job security is as important as job satisfaction, so I disagree with the statement for three reasons. In the first place, staying unemployed is an unpleasant experience. Furthermore, even a secure position would be a good experience and finally, it may change your opinion about that position.

To begin with, although choosing a career may put people under a lot of pressure, staying unemployed is a more stressful situation. People need to become independent and working is the first step of this process. You cannot settle down waiting for an enjoyable occupation while you lose your chance of having a decent less delightful job. My uncle's experience is a compelling example of this idea. He dropped his proper job in order to find a more delightful activity. Having said that at the end he lost not only his former career but his opportunities to get many secure jobs just to find a "satisfying job."

Secondly, being occupied in an area would be a great experience no matter how unsatisfying your job would be. Working in any area is not considered a waste of time due to the fact that by working you gain precious experiences. You can use your previous experiences ~~for to~~ finding future jobs. That is why it is better for people to accept ~~the a~~ secure occupation and look for a suitable job simultaneously. According to a conducted study on employed people, an individual who had had ~~has~~ a secure job and many job experiences tends s to find a desirable job easier than people who refuse to receive a secure position.

Last but not least, it is not reasonable to estimate a career based on what we heard about it. It is more intellectual to enter that specific area and then decide whether it is a pleasant job for us or not. Sometimes working in a field changes s your view point about that ~~spot the post~~ which is why sometimes it is better to not sit waiting for a desirable job. For instance, I thought being a lawyer was not going to make me happy but I gave it a try and much to my surprise it was the exact work that I was looking for.

~~Last but not least~~ to cut a long story short, the aforementioned points and examples have illustrated that I am not in favor of the statement for three reasons. First, you cannot be an unemployed forever just because you think that an activity is not as satisfying as you assumed. Moreover, it is going to be a good experience. Next, your point of view might be changed about that career. I opine that people should give a chance to secure jobs and ~~do~~ not take it hard on themselves in order to be more happy and satisfied.