

Do you agree or disagree with the following statement? It is more important for governments to spend money to improve Internet access than to improve public transportation. Use specific reasons and examples to support your answers.

In today's modern life the Internet and public transportation are two striking factors which are ~~more~~ increasingly merge ~~merging~~ with people's life, so governments should spend more money on these spheres and in my belief the Internet ~~is~~ precede ~~the~~ public transportation and two reasons persuade me to put forward this viewpoint which I will explain with a couple of examples.

At the outset, nowadays people can use the internet for their daily tasks which previously they needed to commute ~~to~~ on the city ~~for~~ before, so if governments spend more money on the internet, most of the people can be teleworkers which can be more beneficial because in that circumstance the traffic and air pollution will be reduced. For example, in coronavirus time some developing countries such as Iran struggled with unpleasant internet connection which ~~has~~ had some irrecoverable damage because some people had to ~~leave~~ ignore/give up the quarantine to run their errands/accomplish their jobs.

Another point is that governments by spending extra money to improve the Internet give an opportunity to society members to enhance their knowledge readily. For instance, in the example above all students in the world had online classes instead of ~~had~~ having actual classes, while if governments ~~did~~ had not provided these suitable conditions for their students, they would have jeopardized the lives of their main assets.

To recap, although public transportation is one of the predominant points, in today's modern life the Internet has an effective impact on people's life because it can aim to enhance their knowledge and also they can telework in distinctive situations, so governments should spend more money ~~in~~ on this area/part.