

Some people who have been in prison become good citizens later. Some people think that having these people ~~to~~ give a talk to school students is the best way to tell them about dangers of committing a crime. Do you agree or disagree?

There is no doubt that crime rates around the world have ~~increases~~ increased by leaps and bounds over the last few years and one of the most effective measures for eradicating crime is to educate adolescents. When it comes to this notion, I opine that the experience of ~~rehabilitate~~ rehabilitating offenders could leave a profound impression on young adults and teach them how to define threats.

On the one hand, imprisonment is a correctional facility which provides offenders with punishments and counselling sessions in order to alter their attitude and behavior. Many wrongdoers end up being decent members of society and their invaluable experience would be informative for the young generation who are prone to crime and can easily ~~be led~~ lead astray. These real-life stories contains information about the repercussion of criminal acts on personal and social life, their dangers and also the sheer boredom of being in jail isolated from beloved family and friends while spending time unproductively. Not only can these stories raise the youth's awareness towards the consequences of committing crimes, but also they help the story tellers to reconnect to society in which they are by and large stigmatized.

On the other hand, some other alternatives are introduced to educate school children such as teaching them law and enforcements in theory by teachers or depicting a utopian society for them in which everyone abides by official regulations and ~~by prepare~~ preparing children to be a decent member of it. I would argue that these steps cannot be as effective as a story of life which elaborates the real menaces. For example, it is claimed that the number of delinquents and drug users dramatically decreased after a movie named "Requiem for a dream" was released. Portraying the life of three addicted adolescents who search for ~~the~~ money and drugs, the famous box office movie left a positive impression on the youth.

In conclusion, a prison sentence may help a perpetrator to become a better person and his experience can alter a prospective delinquent's destiny and encourage him to become more cautious and opt for the right path. Serves as a deterrent/think twice/
