

Individuals can do nothing to change society. Any new developments can only be brought about by governments and large institutions. How far do you agree or disagree?

Who really has the economic and political clout to make substantial changes? Some claim any changes can be brought just by regimes and organizations, How far is that true? Can individuals stand against this trend?

I firmly believe that there are a number of reasons for this argument, Firstly, there is no doubt that the government compared to the ordinary members of society is a leading authority to take the action on special ~~event~~~~occasions~~ and anything which could bring any changes ~~in~~~~on a~~ large-scale, Due to the fact that, these large organizations are legally responsible for making laws, ~~orders,~~ and regulations as well as protecting the environment and other vital functions for ~~the~~ society.

Moreover, nowadays powerful institutions and governments can affect all the globe, they affect the behaviors, beliefs and opportunities of individuals, For instance they have their own broadcast and propaganda systems which have a massive impact on the whole community so they are more likely to be able to bring significant and fundamental changes to the countries.

On the other hand, there are others who point to many cases in which the individuals have brought numerous substantial changes in the past in areas like invention and they claim this trend will continue to grow in the long run. Although this group ~~who~~ point to the cases in which individuals invent something extraordinary, they do not mention that these cases need a great deal of money and time to expand which usually just the government can afford.

To sum up even though in ~~most~~~~few~~ cases individuals ~~might~~ have a role to play ~~into~~ ~~make~~~~making~~ changes ~~on a small scale, for major developments~~~~in large-scale~~ ~~they need~~ support from governments and powerful organizations ~~is needed~~ to gain success.
