

Topic: It is parents` responsibility and not the schools` to teach children moral values. Who is most responsible for children`s moral education and what is the best way to teach right from wrong?

Throughout children's life, there are several teachers including parents, schools, media and their friends whom are of high importance in bringing them up children that will significantly influence their fate in future. In my opinion, although parents as well as school play a major role in children's nurture treatment, media`s effect are undeniable/irresistible.

It is obvious that parents who give birth to their children are the most responsible people for them their children and their future. They could teach their young orphans by spending time with them through playing games and reading books.

Teachers in school are second parents of students. Not only would they teach them mathematics, physics besides other subjects science, but also teaching moral stuffs issues are of one of their huge responsibilities. Students in school are at their formative age, so they would highly be influenced by their environment. As teachers at schools are taught and qualified regarding this issue, it is expected that students as long as educating at school, learn moral topics and become able in order to distinguish right from wrong.

It is really hard to opt for the best way of educating treating children inasmuch as each child demands their its own way based on their talents and their traits. As surveys concerning learning children demonstrate, playing games which are oriented in a way that teach children at least one life skill is one of the helpful methods corresponding this issue.

To sum up, both parents and teachers at school by choosing the appropriate method could assist children in ~~order to~~ makinge better life for themselves.

Shabnam M.