

In this day and age, earning money more and more has become a priority for many families seeking to ensure that their children would be raised ~~rise~~ in ~~as~~ the best a condition as possible. However, some people argue this trend cannot be a wholly positive one. In fact, with mothers and fathers working full-time, a large number of difficulties may occur for children.

To begin with, there are fashions s among people, especially young parents, for being wealthy to afford their kids' ! requirements for becoming successful. For sure it can be a logical idea and perfect objective for a family in this rapidly improving world. That is to say, the further you have money, z the more you have the chance for a happy life. Individuals who grow in a high-class family are more prone to reach their parents' ! statuses. For instance, if you can enroll your kid in the best school in the city, you can expect that your child will receive better education which in turn might lead s him or her into ~~the~~ more suitable job opportunities.

In stark contrast, the latter group points out that spending considerable amounts s of time with children has a direct correlation with the emergence of emerging their talents and capabilities to engage in valuable tasks. To make it clear, juniors who can expose their little victories to their parents are enormously likely to achieve greater ones. In addition, a sense of loneliness in babies with workaholic parents may create develop complexes in about having a coherent family. To make an example, encouraging top-students to work harder, many educational advisors suggest that teachers ~~to~~ admire them before in the eyes of their families.

In a nutshell, although being certain about the children's future economically is a common desire, it may be harmful for their future emotionally.